

AI CONTENT

Your master doc became a junk drawer.

The AI didn't forget your voice. It kept cooking from stale ingredients.

The fix is a split. Not a better doc.

One doc. Two jobs. Neither done well.

- Half is source material: voice, stories, positioning.
- Half is editorial decisions: what to build this week.
- They have different update cycles. They shouldn't live in the same place.

The AI treats all of it as current. None of it is.

HOW SOURCE MATERIAL FAILS

A doc untouched for three months has at least two things that no longer represent you.

A story you retired

The AI still leads with it.

A framing you moved past

The AI still builds from it. Confidently.

It doesn't know what you updated. It only knows what you pasted.

HOW EDITORIAL DECISIONS FAIL

You paste the same doc on Tuesday. The AI has no idea what happened Monday.

The sales conversation from yesterday

Not in the doc. So the AI picks an angle. Just not the live one.

Technically in your voice. Talking about last season's problem.

FILE ONE

The fixed voice guide.

- Two pages. Not more.
- Your real voice. Two or three examples of your best work. What you avoid saying.
- You touch it once a month. Deliberately. Not every session.

If you have to scroll more than once to get through it, it's too long.

FILE TWO

The live source feed.

- Updated before every session. Not once a month.
- Product changes. Customer questions. Conversations that surfaced a real tension.
- Three to five entries. One sentence each. Raw material, not decisions.

Five minutes before the session. That five minutes buys a first draft that doesn't need a rebuild.

THE TWO-FILE SYSTEM

Voice guide first.
Source feed second.
Ask what to build.

Original thought is yours

The observation. The opinion. The specific angle that makes your perspective distinct.

Mechanical drafting is the AI's

Give it your insight. Let it do the writing. Stop asking it to generate both.

That's when content goes generic. The insight has to be yours first.

Templates for both files. Takes twenty minutes to build once. Five minutes to update each week after that.
